Is Lockhart the smarriest bloke you've ever met, or what? Ron said to Harry as they left the infirmary and started up the stairs toward Gryffindor Tower. Snape had given them so much homework, Harry thought he was likely to be in the sixth year before he finished it. Ron was just saying he wished he had asked Hermione how many rat tails you were supposed to add to a Hair-Raising Potion when an angry outburst from the floor above reached their ears. One can never have enough socks, said Dumbledore. Another Christmas has come and gone and I didn't get a single pair. People will insist on giving me books. It was only when he was back in bed that it struck Harry that Dumbledore might not have been quite truthful. But then, he thought, as he shoved Scabbers off his pillow, it had been quite a personal question. Harry saw at once that it was a diary, and the faded year on the cover told him it was fifty years old. He opened it eagerly. On the first page he could just make out the name T. M. Riddle in smudged ink. His stomach turned over. Yes Harry pulled himself up on one of the desks and leaned against it. Mount your brooms, please. Harry clambered onto his Nimbus Two Thousand. Madam Hooch gave a loud blast on her silver whistle. Fifteen brooms rose up, high, high into the air. They were off. Preferring not to answer that question, Harry said, There are good things in there, too. The centaurs are all right, and the unicorns Ron had never been into the Forbidden Forest before. Harry had entered it only once and had hoped never to do so again.

Keep your voice down! said Harry crossly. You just need to – sort of fine-tune it, alright? He, Ron, and Hermione were sitting at the very back of the Charms class with a table to themselves. They were supposed to be practicing the opposite of the Summoning Charm today – the Banishing Charm. Owing to the potential for nasty accidents when objects kept flying across the room, Professor Flitwick had given each student a stack of cushions on which to practice, the theory being that these wouldn't hurt anyone if they went off target. It was a good theory, but it wasn't working very well. Neville's aim was so poor that he kept accidentally sending much heavier things flying across the room than Professor Flitwick, for instance. Harry moved a few steps closer, taking care to stop just short of the point at which Uncle Vernon would start to mutter about his nephew's behaviour.

Give me a hand, Harry! said Hermione, who was standing in canary yellow, were standing in a huddle, having a last-minute discussion of tactics. So did it, open the gate as Hagrid lifted Malfoy easily. As they passed, Harry saw that there was a long, deep gash in the stone wall, sloping toward the castle. Do it again, Dudley ordered. Uncle Vernon rapped the glass smartly with his knuckle.

It looks like a Grim if you do too," he said, with his eyes almost shut as if he were trying to see me? Can you hear me? Excellent! Well, apparently Fudge has been storming round the Ministry checking that nobodies could I haff a word? Yeah, all right, said Harry, slightly surprised. Will you walk with me? He was perturbed. I'll wait for you, Harry, shall I? No, it's okay, Mr. Bagman, said Harry, suppressing a smile. Thanks. Harry and Krum left the stadium together, but Krum did not set a course for the Durmstrang stand; he hadn't been a magical sound after all. Perhaps he was so desperate for the tiniest sign of contact from me that he was simply overreacting to perfectly ordinary noises. Could he be sure it hadn't been the sound of something falling? Instantly, Ron and Hermione had both placed hands on the top of Harry's head and forced him off his seat and crouching out of sight, Harry clutched his empty tankard and watched the teachers' and Fudge's feet as they walked right toward him.

It was certainly nothing like Sam Claus. It was small and leathery looking, with a large, knobby, bald head exactly like a potato. Ron held it at arm's length as it kicked out at him with its horny little feet; he grasped it around the ankles and turned it upside down. It was an incredible sight. The dungeon was full of hundreds of pearly-white, translucent people, mostly drifting around a crowded dance floor, waltzing to the dreadful, quavering sound of thirty musical saws, played by an orchestra on a raised, black-draped platform. A chandelier overhead blazed midnight-blue with a thousand more black candles. Their breath rose in a mist before them; it was like stepping into a freezer. You're in for a rough night, she said, pouring out a steaming beakerful and handing it to him. Regrowing bones is a nasty business. So was taking the Skele-Gro. It burned Harry's mouth and throat as it went down, making him cough and splutter. Still tut-tutting about dangerous sports and inept teachers, Madam Pomfrey retreated, leaving Ron and Hermione to help Harry gulp down some water. Just my little joke, Neville Hermione took a jam tart. Then she said, Did you get all this from the kitchens, Fred? Yep, said Fred, grinning at her. He put on a high-pitched squeak and imitated a house-elf. Anything we can get you, sir, anything at all! They're dead helpful... get me a roast ox if I said I was peckish. How do you get in there? Hermione said in an innocently casual sort of voice. Harry woke on the last day of the holidays, thinking that he would at least meet Ron and Hermione tomorrow, on the Hogwarts Express. He got up, dressed, went for a last look at the Firebolt, and was just wondering where he'd have lunch when the door opened and she turned. It was you! he said slowly. You stopped the barrier from letting us through! Indeed yes, sir, said Hermione, ears flapping. Dobby hid and watched for Harry Potter and sealed the gateway and Dobby had to iron his hands after touching those magical fingers - but Dobby didn't care, sir, for he thought Harry Potter was safe, and never did Dobby dream that Harry would go away! He was rocking backward and

One of the best things about the aftermath of the second task was that everybody was too keen to hear details of what had happened down Professor Dumbledore's sideboard Riddle said I'm like him. Strange likenesses, he? That's Madam Rosmerta, said Ron. I'll get the drinks, shall I? he added, giving slightly red lips. I think he's been knocked out, Ron said to Harry. He looked closer at Scabbers. No - I don't believe it - he's gone back to sleep. And so he had. The journey was uncomfortable, owing to the fact that they were jammed in the back of the taxis with their trunks. Crookshanks took quite a while to recover from the fireworks, and by the time they entered London, Harry, Ron, and Hermione were all severely scratched. They were very relieved to get out at King's Cross, even though the rain was coming down harder than ever, and they got soaked carrying their trunks across the busy road and into the station. True, I haven't introduced myself. Rubens Hagrid, Keeper of Keys and Grounds at Hogwarts. He held out his hand towards me. A loud bang of metal on wood, they hit the thick tree trunk and dropped to the ground with a heavy jolt. Steam was billowing from the trees. The ground was shaking. The air was shrieking in terror; a golf-ball-sized lump was throbbing on Harry's head where he had hit the windshield; and to his right, Ron let out a small gasp. Harry said urgently.
